City water quality report released

Branson in full compliance with drinking water standards

The Missouri Department of Natural Resources has released the city of Branson's annual Water Quality Report for the 2010 calendar year, and Branson was in full compliance with the water quality standards.

The report is an Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) requirement of all water systems, both municipal and private. The Missouri DNR regulates all water systems and requires testing on a regular basis to ensure its safety. The purpose of the Water Quality Report is to inform residents of a community about the quality of their water and to allow them to see the actual elements in the water based on tests performed during the year. The report also contains definitions of terms and other information about the water system in Branson.

The report must mention any violations of water quality standards that might have occurred during 2010. The city of Branson was in full compliance with no violations noted.

According to the DNR, drinking water may reasonably be expected to contain at least small amounts of some contaminants as it travels over the surface of the land or through the ground. The water dissolves naturally-occurring minerals and can pick up substances resulting from the presence of animals or from human activity. However, the presence of contaminants does not necessarily indicate that water poses a health risk.

Branson operates two water treatment plants where 96 percent of the water treated comes from Lake Taneycomo and six groundwater wells that account for 4 percent of the water treated.

During 2010, the city produced 1.26 billion gallons of drinking water. The peak month for water production in 2010 was August.

Copies of the 2010 EPA Water Quality Report are available for public inspection at the Branson Utilities Department, 616 West Pacific; Branson City Hall at 110 West Maddux and on the city's website, www.bransonmo.gov. Residents can also call the Consumer Confidence Hotline at 417-243-2740.
